The Renault Clio Dynamique S Nav dCi 110...

Road tested by Robin Roberts (Miles Better News Agency).

Consistently one of the best sellers in the Renault range and frequently refreshed, the Clio 'supermini sector' five door hatchback can hold its own against rivals and is positively ahead of many with its refinement.

It slots very well into its competitive sector in terms of size and design, its powertrains cover the most popular choices and it's very well priced.

The current Clio IV range runs to almost 30 models in six trim levels based on three petrol and two diesel power offerings, with manual or automatic transmission and from £12,225 to £22,775.

Our review car cost about £2,000 more than the standard version, being fitted with extras including techno pack comprising multimedia system with hands-free connectivity, parking sensors both ends and reversing camera, metallic paint, tinted windows and spare wheel. These are highly desirable options to be considered.

It is the most popular in demand and we loved the combination of 110 hp diesel with its effective 8-valve design keeping down engine noise while delivering reasonably good responses.

A light and progressive clutch smoothly fed in the slick, effortless six-speed economy chosen ratios and the balance to the footbrake made town and open-road driving very easy-going. I thought the handbrake was set for the left-hand-drive market and not so convenient if you have a large hand, but the adjustable column and steering were excellent.

Secondary controls are a mixture of well and poorly placed buttons, some immediately in sight while others were hidden behind the wheel-spokes or low down on the fascia.

Instruments were not marked in detail but easy to read nevertheless and had a central multi-function info panel directly in front of the driver.

Simple heating and ventilation controls for distribution, output and temperature were effective and the system worked well throughout the cabin, with powered windows but no sunroof option.

Oddments space was a series of small compartments with irregular door pockets included and you do not have a big place to, say, take a box of tissues for a family. Seat back pockets are provided for those in the back. There was a modest lip to the boot access and its regular shape quickly increased when the seats were dropped, meaning it was very practical.

For driver and passengers the doors opened wide, you could slip in with little trouble and there was good room once seated, with plenty of leg and headroom in the front in particular.

Visibility was a slight issue to the back with thick C-pillars and a high waist giving a small back window. You really need those parking sensors and the optional camera is one of the clearest I have ever used, including on much more expensive cars. Lights and wipers were very effective.

The Clio's ride quality was very good, bad surfaces being shrugged off - although they could be heard underneath, and the wrap-around front seats securely held driver and passenger, also adjustment was comprehensive for any size or shape of user.

As well as being comfortable the Renault Clio's handling was accurate and responsive, giving it an agility belying its size and never causing a moment's concern.

However, I was a bit concerned about the claimed average consumption indicated by Renault's Euro-tests of 80 mpg. I thought I was doing very well to get over 50 mpg most of the time and it never went below 44 mpg when pressed in heavy traffic and with frequent gear-changes, but that lab-tested figure seems a French fancy.

VERDICT

The economy in my hands was very acceptable and realistic and combined with the sophistication and refinement of the Clio Dynamique S it becomes a very attractive family car with low running and ownership costs.

For: Smooth and refined powertrain, economical, good ride and handling, comfortable and quiet.

Against: Restricted rear visibility, obscured secondary controls, modest oddments space, unrealistic official Combined Cycle fuel economy figure.
